

Abstract:

The bachelor thesis focuses on description and analysis of psychological aspects present in the mediation process which is recognized as a form of interpersonal conflict solution process. Mediation is described as one of the applied psychological disciplines and in this regard it is compared to some of traditional examples. The main part of the thesis consists of theoretical description and analysis of specific psychological aspects of mediation. The following part consists of a research project design, that proposes experimental verification of the psychological aspects influence on the mediation process. The objective of the thesis is to recognize mediation as an applied psychological discipline and to introduce the basic psychological aspects of the mediation process, that need to be acknowledged by the mediation professionals.