This master thesis focuses on values and life satisfaction of young adults. Theoretical part defines the concept of the terms “values”, “life satisfaction”, and “early adulthood”. After that, results of the existing research on the topic of values and life satisfaction are introduced.

Quantitative section of the empirical part examines the correlation between the level of importance of 23 values and the level of satisfaction in 23 different areas of life. Data sample consisted of 726 young adults. Quantitative section is followed by a qualitative research to compensate for deficiencies of the quantitative method.

Results showed that 19 out of 23 areas have a statistically significant correlation between the level of value’s importance and the level of satisfaction in the relevant area of life. One area of life manifested a statistically significant negative correlation.

This research initiates a challenge to examine the relationship between the level of values’ importance and the level of satisfaction in the respective areas of life more thoroughly.
