

This is a borderline work which stands with its subject between psychology, social work and law. The aim of the thesis is to identify and describe some psychosocial determinants, which may influence successful or unsuccessful fulfilling of alternative correction of generally useful work. We have based on theoretical processing of psychological and forensic aspects of the correction. We have called attention to the presumption of its effectiveness, which is based on one side on the quality of penitential work, on the other side on the certain individual, his personal structure, the level of his social, emotional or intellectual disruption.