

This study examines heterosexual experience of homosexual men. We observe occurrence of heterosexual relationships and sexual experience with women and men in personal history of a respondent. We compare feelings of excitement towards men and women in different situations and observe usage of sexual practices and precautions in sex life. We tested the hypothesis that individuals of older age group have more heterosexual relationships and experience than younger individuals. We assumed higher occurrence of heterosexual relationships and heterosexual experience during the process of coming out. Another hypothesis is, that occurrence of heterosexual relationships and experience is higher in small towns. Last hypothesis is that homosexual individuals – believers have more heterosexual relationships than nonbelievers. 100 participants answered questionnaires designed for this study. We obtained findings concerning sexual life of the participants. None of the hypothesis' was confirmed, although there are indications that if more representative set is found, the hypothesis would be most probably confirmed.
