

This master's thesis focuses on Christmas celebration, the phenomenon which has been the key issue approached by ethnographers since the national revival. Combining semiotic and ethnographic methods, it examines the general semiotics (the first part), analyses the contemporary research on Christmas (the second part), and provides the qualitative research of this celebration.