

This study is about football hooliganism. In these days every single person meets the sport practically every day. Sport became the one of the all-socially important spheres of the life. We can say that the sport became the very important institution through the twentieth century.

This study engages in football, resp. in problem of football hooliganism.

Where it came from? How does the situation look in different European countries? Last but not least, the study search for motives and causes of football hooliganism.

People which come to the stadiums and other sport facilities are very heterogeneous mix of individuals and groups. Sports spectators can mutually differ in age, sex, nationality but also in social economic status. We can observe this difference in their value orientations. This heterogeneity of value orientations can project to reciprocal interactions and it can haunt to opinion conflicts so as attitude conflicts.

It is necessary to ask, where comes this people from, it means from which social stratas, which are the main causes of their behavior (personality, influence of family, influence of school, influence of contemporaries), are they interested in sport or they only need discharge frustration of their life, why did they aim at football etc.
