

Syllable based compression is a new approach to text compression. An important aspect of this approach are the dictionaries of common syllables. They are used in compression algorithms initialization and greatly affect the compression ratio. Until now they were created by a rather straight-forward analysis of text corpora. We believe that dictionaries created by genetic algorithms may help us lower the compression ratio. In this study we will design such an algorithm and test it on Czech and English texts.