The aim of this bachelor thesis is to find out, how has changed the daily life of the former employees of the Žatec military airport, called „Korea“. The thesis focuses on the testimonies and changes in the interpretations of the livelihood of the former Žatec „Korea“ Airport employees in the context of the changes that have affected the airport building. The thesis also follows the life strategies and coping ways, which did these people had at their disposal, in order to acclimatize to a new way of life and in shaping of their new life path. The scope of the thesis is also extended by the summary of how does the daily life of the former employees from this airport in the Žatec region looks like today. Research of everyday life, which I cocnlude during this work, arise from theoretical concepts of phenomenological sociology, presented by Alfred Schütz. I examine everyday life in this region through extension of this concept by elements of material culture, colective memory and social identity. Everyday life changes are observed through interview with informants, but also through analysis of Žatec weekly press. The conclusions of this thesis submits, what are the changes that happened to the everyday life around „Korea“ Airport. These changes are explained by interpretations of informants, but also by the statements of regional press.
