

This paper is a review of literature published on informal payments for health care in transition post-socialist societies of Eastern Europe. Historical background of emerging informal payments in 1980-90s and a review of transformation activities in each state are summarised. Furthermore, the characteristics of informal payments are studied, as well as their possible systemic role and impact on equity and efficiency of health care and policy implications.