

Abstract

This bachelor thesis is addressing the topic of the distinctive usage of the verbal aspectual forms in Russian and Upper-Sorbian languages. The thesis is aiming to describe the use cases of these forms, point out the similarities and distinctions as well as to attempt to explore the possible reasons for those distinctions. The thesis is divided into two parts – a theoretical part and practical part. In the theoretical part is provided general descriptions of the Russian verbal aspect along with a detailed description of the Upper-Sorbian verbal aspect. Next, the thesis is focusing on the distinctions in their use cases, and in the practical part the specific examples are being analyzed. The examples for the analysis are found in the literature and include parallel texts. In the conclusion there is an attempt to summarize the results of the analysis conducted and suggest the topics for the future research.