

In this thesis probability distribution of five random variables related to success runs in a sequence of Bernoulli trials was found. The technique of imbedding random sequences into Markov chains is used and improved compared to existing results. For every run a Markov chain was constructed, the definition of imbedding was verified, a method for computation of its distribution was stated and examples of distribution were computed.