

Our main interest in the thesis is Poisson point process and one of its characteristics - intensity function. Whenever Poisson process has intensity function, its distribution is uniquely determined by it. Our main goal is to determine how to deduce from observed data whether intensity function is separable. We present a formal test of this hypothesis assuming exponential model of the intensity function depending on finite number of parameters. Properties of this test are then examined in a simulation study.