

ABSTRACT

This diploma thesis deals with the issue of homosexuality in the context of its current situation in Czech society and in connection with the education of secondary school students. The theoretical part of the thesis is mainly focused on a thorough mapping of the Czech Republic homosexual environment, from explaining the basic terminology related to the topic, explaining the essence of homosexuality in connection with related circumstances, to analyzing the human-rights aspect and placing the issue of homosexuality into a secondary school education program. The aim of the practical part is to find out what students are aware of the topic also in the context with secondary (or primary) education or preventive activities at school. This as described is implemented on the basis of quantitative research, and as a method of data collection a questionnaire was chosen. The analysis of the data shows that high school students have a good knowledge of the issue, however it is probably not based on a secondary or primary education due to the fact, that the topic of homosexuality wasn't discussed in the curriculum or prevention programs, as a one-fifth of the respondents said. Research also reveals, that students' attitudes toward homosexuality are rather positive. In the end of the work, there is an output for a practice, which is a series of worksheets with time schedules of individual lessons and with other related data. Worksheets are made up based on the need for cooperation and discussion and can serve as an inspiration for other teachers.
