

Abstract

The bachelor's thesis "Sexual double standard or different evaluation of sexual behavior of men and women" deals with the phenomenon, which assumes that men and women are evaluated differently for the same sexual behavior. The work aims to find out whether this phenomenon of sexual double standard occurs among students of technical and humanities universities and eventually, whether there is any difference between groups of students in its occurrence. The work also deals with different attitudes to sexuality between students, but also between men and women and also focuses on the influences that shape attitudes or just that double standard. These influences include religious orientation or age. The work also briefly presents the trends of sexual behavior of the Czech population or the connection of the double standard phenomenon with gender stereotypes. The work is divided into theoretical and practical parts. While the theoretical part presents the main theories that explain the phenomenon - evolutionary theory, social role theory, and sexual script theory, the practical part presents quantitative research, which was carried out using online questionnaire survey and helped clarify research questions and especially whether the phenomenon appears in the surveyed sample of respondents. The conclusion of the work is devoted to the evaluation of the findings from the practical part and a discussion that tries to clarify these findings.