

Abstract

This work tries to introduce an alternative pedagogical approach, laboratory schools, in psychological contexts. It briefly describes the history, principles and methods from psychological perspective on which the approach was based. It presents examples of current practice by analyzing the form of these principles and methods in today's laboratory schools. The research proposal compares the development of executive functions and possible connections with the type of educational approach.