The objective of this thesis is to analyse current legislation in Czech Republic regarding consumer law, especially business contracts concluded with customers. The main objective of this thesis is the assessment of selected provisions of the consumer legislation from entrepreneur's view and analyse whether the consumer protection provisions in question are justified and not unreasonably limiting for the entrepreneur.

The thesis is divided into 5 main chapters. Each of them deals with selected aspects of the topic in question. For the completion of the thesis were used domestic and foreign resources, especially legislation, specialised literature and the case-law.

First chapter is introductory and contains my reasons and motivation for the choice of the thesis topic. Second chapter briefly summarizes world history of consumer law and history of consume law in Czech Republic. The focus is mainly on putting the Czech consumer law into context with European Union consumer law, because it is primarily based on it. The aim of the third chapter is to carefully define the main terms of consumer law which will be used in the whole thesis. The fourth chapter is the most comprehensive and forms the core of the entire thesis. It is divided into four thematic areas. First one of them describes the systematic of consumer law in valid and effective Czech legislation. Second area analyses the general requirements for concluding a contract with consumer and consequent general conditions for the entrepreneur. The third area deals with distance contracts and contracts negotiated away from business premises, and describes special requirements arising from the special manners of concluding the contracts and arising obligations. In the fourth area of the third chapter are identified and analysed selected provisions of consumer law, which were identified by the author as problematic regarding the proportion of advantage for consumers and unreasonable limitation for the entrepreneur.

Last chapter of the thesis is consisted of the conclusion, which evaluates the outcomes arising from the completion of the thesis.
