

Liability for defects is one of the important elements of contract for work. This thesis deals with comparison of the current regulation of defects liability in contract for work as provided by the Civil Code and contract for work as provided by the Commercial Code. Individual topics are addressed jointly to show common features of liability and differences in approach to liability for defects in the Civil Code and the Commercial Code. Individual explications are also supplemented by the case law, which has in many instances already helped to overcome certain interpretation difficulties. The aim of this thesis is to find the general features of civil liability for defects under a contract for work. Before others it concentrates on the concept of defective performance and the concept of defect, which are the cornerstone to liability for defects. This thesis also examines the concept of consumer law on general level.
