

This bachelor thesis deals with the issue of independence testing in sparse contingency tables. It defines contingency tables and describes their creation and properties. It presents the most commonly used independence tests and proposes tests suitable for the problem of independence testing in sparse contingency tables. It compares the tests using an illustrative example and a simulation study in which it examines the properties of tests for sparse contingency tables and compares them with frequently used tests.