

This thesis analyses the emergence and history of modern Czech media and characterizes public opinion and political culture in the context of both positive and negative influences of media on voters. It points out the important role of journalists in the world of media and the function of „Ethic Codex of Journalists“. An important part of the thesis deals with research on media influence on political thought and citizens' behaviour with a reference to Czech parliamentary elections of 2006.