

Abstract

The thesis aims to discuss a theoretical framework of the U. S. congressional midterm elections and specify their fundamental functions and importance. The thesis analyses the transformation of midterm elections as well as their effects on the political system with a special focus on the period 1990-2008. Following the analysis of particular midterm elections, it concludes that some of the theoretical premises need to be revised.