

Personal data protection and public administration

Abstract

This thesis is aimed to personal data protection in connection to public administration. Given the extensiveness of the topic, the author is focused on the most important issues related to the area of personal data protection. The main area of the study is the terminology, and the effect on the public administration. The goal of the thesis is to provide clear and comprehensive explanation of terms related to personal data protection. The goal is accomplished due to expansive explanation of those terms in order to appropriately connect the reader with the topic.

The thesis is divided into four chapters. The first chapter aims to systematization of personal data protection. In addition to that, also explaining the crucial term of this thesis, the personal data. The second chapter deals with historical context and evolution of the data protection. The historical context provides the explanation of the relevant data protection laws, which determined the evolution of the data protection itself. The third chapter concentrates to the merit of the thesis, therefore General Data Protection regulation. Each of those subchapters were selected by the author to provide only the crucial terms and not to overflow the reader with a less important terms. The third chapter is mentioning the most important national, respectively European case-law. The fourth chapter is focused on status and role of the Office for personal data protection. Author mainly focuses on jurisdiction of supervising authority.

Key words

GDPR, processing of personal data, Office for personal data protection