ADDITIONAL WRITTEN COMMENTS

Reviewer 1

The thesis is centered around an idea that is not innovative. That the intervention of Russia to save the Assad regime has been effective, along with the engagement of Iran and Iran-backed Shiite militias, has been a well-known fact for anyone following the developments in Syria. Apart from a non-original central idea and RQs, the thesis sits on two unrelated goals: while the first one is the analysis of Russia's involvement in the Syrian Civil War (and its impact, which is somewhat sidelined in the actual analysis), the author goes an extra mile to explicate the causes of the Western non-engagement in the War and an array of factors that led to the Assad regime's success. The disconnect between the two goals permeates the thesis, which is unfocused, at times descriptive, theoretically uninformed, and in spite (or because of) its empirical richness, fails to deliver a coherent message. The resultant thesis is thus a mere repetition of well-known empirical truths put together without actual contribution. On the other hand, I appreciate the effort put by the author to make sense of an extremely complex phenomenon. While it has little to offer in terms of its innovative contribution, the thesis offers a relatively well-written summary of the causes of Russia's involvement, Western failure to engage in the conflict in a thoughtful way, and the general causes conducive to the fiasco of the revolution.

This is an exclusively descriptive thesis that tries to make sense of a very complex issue through a rather inadequate methodological approach. The main problem here is that the research puzzle appears to be too wide for scope and purposes of a Master's thesis. This fundamental weakness, to my mind, results in the production of a draft that is empirically rich, yet makes little to no effort to contribute theoretically or in any original way to the comprehension of a very complex issue.
