

Abstract

This bachelor's thesis examines the transition of young people from orphanages into independent life. The work illustrates the changes these young people experience during late adolescence and the specifics of said changes, which differ from juveniles that have the luxury of growing up in families. The work shows presently practiced legislative procedures focused on the mechanics of their departure from children's homes, wherein I also added space for topics related to their subsequent social support. Similarly, there's also a description of the entities aiding in this stage of the transition. In a segment of the empirical section, with the usage of interviews, I took the liberty to propose changes to above mentioned legislation and with the aid of questionnaires I came to conclusions about their functionality and attainability.
