

The Bachelor thesis deals with the subject of early termination of life by looking at workers assisting the profession. The theoretical part of the work consists of four main chapters: Causes and manifestations of will to end life prematurely, Options for ending life prematurely, Environments where people die and Assisting professions. The practical part looks at how workers assisting professions in direct care perceive, experience and deal with situations related to death and early termination of life in their profession. An equally important part is finding the sources of support that workers can use in such challenging situations. The research was carried out using a qualitative method through semi-structured interviews with workers who have experience with the issue in their work.
