

In this diploma thesis I deal with the criminal personality profiling of criminal acts. I have tried to summarise this subject in an integral form and have emphasised forensic psychological use in practice. A kernel of an entire methodology may be sought in some of the scientific disciplines, especially in psychology, psychiatry, sociology, and demography among others. This methodology arises from human behaviour and, thus, cannot emerge as an exact science. I describe the process of the compilation of a profile and, in some places, I recap the repeated symbols of the criminal acts and, specifically, I characterise a perpetrator of diverse criminal activities. My goal is to draw this theme to the attention of otherwise uninterested people, to stress the interconnection and the possibility of its use in criminal practice and to mention further associated methodologies such as computer databases and geographical profiling. Offender profiling is undergoing rapid development and is subject to constant new developments from specialized investigators.