

The bachelor theses focuses on the prevention of drug addiction among children, specifically the education of parents in these matters. Family upbringing is understood to be one of the fundamental factors of prevention, which helps reducing the risk of drug related problems. The aim of this theses is to emphasize the necessity of informing and educating parents in these questions. Parents may take advantage of the gathered knowledge in applying the efficient drug prevention.

The first part of the theses addresses the theoretical side of drug addiction. The basic terms, sub-division of drug types and methods of application are explained. Further more, the causes leading to drug addiction, negative effects of drug abuse, methods of prevention, types of therapy and information about legal regulations in the Czech Republic are also discussed. The second part adresses the family upbringing as one of the factors in the prevention of drug addiction. The third part of the theses is the orientational research of parents' knowledge in matters concerning drug addiction. An integral part of the bachelor theses is a framework of a parents' guide entitled „Do you know as much about drugs as your child does?“
