

My dissertation is about friendship and its ageless features. Friendship is a close relationship most often between two people and is characteristic by - mutuality, intimacy: trust, need of closeness, sharing of experience, positive appreciation and unconditional acceptance. Thanks to mutuality are friends able to share various personal experiences, opinions and feelings. Thanks to deeper understanding of both individuals is possible to create functional and satisfying friendship.

The friendship among people does exist for long centuries and I would like to show the difference between nowadays and the age of Aristoteles and his point of view. It is a comparison of present respondents, interviews and created map of terms to map of terms created from concept of Aristoteles.

My work wants to show that friendship today is actually quite the same as many years ago in the time of Aristoteles. Of course with little changes especially in the area of free time and its spending.

Many interesting facts have come from my interviews and they actually match those written by Aristoteles in his famous work Nicomachos' Ethics.

After interviews I found out that friendship between respondents is understood like relationship between two people which is intimate-life and death friendship- and essential parts of friendship are characteristics of friend like trust, honesty, wiliness, respect, reliability, content. The essential positive thing for friendship seems to be physical closeness. It is not possible to have full friendship without it.

There are two ways how to name this relationship, some people have more friends, group of friends, bodies. But the point is that the respondents feel it the same way, friendship or group of friends, doesn't matter.
