Determining patterns of alcohol consumption among high school students is an essential element in studies on public health and prevention of risky behaviour at a young age. This bachelor's thesis focuses on examining alcohol use among high school students with an emphasis on factors influencing their consumption, such as social environment, family influences, and personal preferences.

The thesis combines quantitative and qualitative research methods, including questionnaire surveys and individual interviews, to gain a comprehensive understanding of students' alcohol-related behaviours.

The main aim of the survey was to find out how often secondary school students use alcohol and for what reasons. A sub-objective of the research was to map the impact of alcohol on students' social relationships and students' views on the availability of alcohol in the Czech Republic
