Adjustment of visa issues in the law of the Schengen acquis and temporary stay and movement of third country nationals in the Schengen area

The aim of this work is to describe how visa issue is adapted into the law of Schengen acquis and European law as the compensatory measure to the free movement of persons in the Schengen area and conditions which have to be met by a third country national for legal temporary stay and movement in the Schengen area.

In the first part (article II) of this work, it is described how visa issue was incorporated into the European law through the Schengen acquis and Amsterdam treaty as the compensatory measure.

The second part (article III) deals with the conditions that have to be met for legal temporary stay and movement of third country nationals in the Schengen area. It describes the conditions for legal entry into this area and then the most important condition (in the view of this work) which is the visa requirement. Here it is described which third nationals need visa for legal entry, what is Schengen visa and which types of visas could be issued as the Schengen visa.

Next part of the work (article IV) is about the procedure of issuing uniform short-stay visas. Here it is described which diplomatic representation is responsible for issuing visas and the procedure that is followed and which conditions have to be met to issue Schengen visa.

The decision whether the Schengen visa will or will not be issued is made by diplomatic representation and is based on the application form, the documents that are included and the interview with the applicant. In this part, it is described which options the applicant has if the visa is not issued.

The fourth part (article V) is about the law institutes that are applied when the third country national does not have visa for legal entry and short-stay in the Schengen area.

The last part evaluates if the visa issue is compensatory measure and if it helps to free movement of persons in the Schengen area and I consider the visa issue to be necessary for safety of the Schengen area.
