

Abstract

This bachelor's thesis focuses on the analysis of India's security policy towards Africa in the period from 2013 to 2024. The aim is to identify India's strategic priorities on the African continent, evaluate the tools used, and assess the effectiveness of this policy. The thesis systematically examines India's engagement in various African regions, with a focus on UN peacekeeping missions, maritime cooperation, military training, arms deliveries, and counterterrorism activities. The analysis is based on both primary and secondary sources, including official documents of the Indian government, reports from international organizations, and academic literature. In conclusion, the thesis evaluates the extent to which India's security cooperation aligns with its long-term strategic objectives and whether India's influence on the African continent has developed in this domain over the given period.
