

Abstract

This bachelor thesis deals with the development of religiosity in the Czech Republic after the year 1989. Its aim is to give a short summary of this 20 year-long period. As a necessary introduction the historical context is summarized in the first chapter. The second chapter is focused on the position of churches during the time of the velvet revolution. The next chapter describes the social changes that happened after the revolution and shows the position of the churches in the society. The fourth chapter is analysing the population censii results of the Czech Statistical Office. Its aim is to give an overview of our traditional religious scene. It also mentions some research work that was done in this area. The fifth chapter is dealing with the phenomenon of new religious movements and their activities in our country. A few of them are characterised at the end of the chapter. The last chapter gives a summary about the most important facts.