

I deal with constructional activities performed at country estates of Prague burgesses or persons, who were no longer considered to be lawful burgesses, but who had had their roots in that community. I target the period from the first known references on activities of those persons in the country approximately in the middle of the 13th century until the end of the 15th century. Constructional activities can nowadays be recognized nearly exclusively at two types of buildings – residencies (forts, strongholds, castles) and churches. The utmost boom of building activities at country estates belonging to „burgesses“ can be seen from the middle of the 14th century until the burst of the Hussite Wars. The most attractive region, where the concerned persons had invested their resources, proved to be the one east of Prague.