

This paper is an interdisciplinary review of the cooperation between the stylistic and the syntactic system. The topic we analyze is common to stylistics and the language culture, the syntactic system being its complement. The paper is intended to be a "deep structure" of any possible stylistic approach to language as well as of any approach from the field of language culture, eg. of any approach that uses stylistic indexing of language means and that lists these indexes in its language descriptions. Current approaches to language culture focus mainly on discussing the criteria of ascribing certain stylistic marks to language means. We presume that the question of which stylistic qualities are brought into an utterance by the means of different structural levels and how these qualities can be reflected in linguistic descriptions is at least of the same importance. Our paper focuses on stylistic qualities of syntactic means and we present them from structural point of view and by means of excerption from current syntactic works.
