

This thesis deals with questions of urban development in the Roman city of Camuntum. The main focus is foremost to specify and review the global structure of settlement, urbanism and civilian architecture during the first four hundred AD. In the first chapters provide an overview of location and historical situation of Camuntum. In the following chapters the description of the urban settlement is divided into "civilian" and , "military" territory. including description of several archaeological findings and monuments, mainly public buildings and religious areas. Furthermore, questions related to typology of dwelling-houses and their interior have not been omitted. The thesis also tries to summarize other topics associated with the area of Roman provinces, for example trade and burialground. The last part of the thesis is devoted to comparison and parallels with other important sites in the area of Rhine and Danube.