

This doctoral thesis aims to analyse the gender categories of male and female in a historical perspective, focusing in particular on the following issues: 1. whether and to what extent these categories were defined in the early modern period (the construction of gender in the early modern texts, the contemporary gender norms and the theory of gender); 2. how the particular genders interrelate, whether and how the binary opposition between masculinity and femininity was being defined in that historical period.