

This bachelor thesis deals with theoretical findings on ectopic pregnancy and the ways of its therapy using some methods of assisted reproduction. The main focus of the dissertation is a qualitative research describing and evaluating the quality of women's life after ectopic pregnancies with subsequent inability to conceive naturally. The research showcases the important events and their evolution over time and gives reports on cliffhanging benchmark situations affecting the quality and degree of the women's resistance with recurrent ectopic pregnancies.