

This thesis examines existing algorithms for solving the problem of the longest common subsequence. It tries to apply them to the problem of effective archiving of data which differ a little, because they are, for example, just versions of one file. There are also new methods suggested. Those are based on the examined algorithms. Then the algorithms are compared according to the reached results and their running time.