

This thesis focuses on the proces of adoption of western food elements into the japanese food system. The first part contains a brief overview of food history in Japan. The next part is about the introduction of various ingredients, which is followed by a description of social classes and their role in spreading and consolidating these ingredients and their cooking techniques in the life of common people.