

Abstract

The thesis deals with the living situation of people in the Moravian Slovakia region, whose homes suddenly appeared just a few kilometers from newly founded state border after the quick split of Czechoslovakia into two separate republics in 1993. Through the legacy of oral history, the thesis analyses and interprets interviews with the region's inhabitants, their political attitudes and opinions concerning the split of Czechoslovakia (it eventually takes in account the changes of such opinions during a concrete time period). The analyses tend to highlight impacts of the political split against quotidian life of the people. The author focused his attention in interviewing the living witnesses of the first split of Czechoslovakia in 1939 including the generation of people who started began professional life at the time the second division of Czechoslovakia.
