

This master's thesis focuses on studying how the foundation boards perceive responsibility. The research based on both the method of directed interviews with the representatives of some of the foundations and a content analysis of their annual reports shows that the members of the boards are willing to promote civil society, they however lack the strategic approach by which they would analyse both the needs of the key stakeholders and the actual impact of supported projects.