

The aim of this thesis is presented based on several years of investigative research, resulting in the publication of partial results particularly in regional proceedings, to submit a If possible, the final report on the effect of first-century Franciscan Turnov, respectively.

throughout the region. Studying the effect of religious institutions in the Czech lands during the early modern times has its importance for several reasons. The smaller percentage of the then total population of religious community, the number of its members did, the more important influence on the development and practical all segments of society only acquire its existence. Finally, the contemporary phrase noted that the monasteries are in the world and the world in monasteries. Likewise, no doubt can Elbl agree with Martin that religious communities were more or less faithful picture of the whole company and both components interacted. (Překlad vytvořen dodatečně)
