

The aim of this study is not to assess whether the transfer was morally correct or to generalize my findings, but to summarize various data, events, research and information related to this theme in one unit and to offer readers an unbiased, comprehensive and understandable work. The theoretical part of this study will outline relations between Czechs and Germans in the recent past. The next section of the study will map the individual phases of the transfer, their characteristics and problems, including displacement losses. In the practical section of the work, I will describe the area of research and the methodology of data collection. Afterwards I will focus on stories of persons involved in the transfer from the region of Podkrkonoší which were collected by the oral history method. Primarily due to the method of oral history, I would like to show this problem from the so-called “other side”.