ABSTRACT

The main content of this Thesis is to assess the situation of the Greek minority in the territory of the Czech Republic in the context of its arrival, settlement and integration to the major society. The aim is to assess the current situation of the minority and its transnational activities.

The Greek minority in our country is numerically stable and fully integrated into the main society. The typical feature of minority is the identification with other members of minority through their organizations and also through the internal identification with the country of their origin (namely Greece), by the traditional culture, history, cuisine and language.

The Thesis is divided into eight parts that are relevant to understanding the problems of Greek minority in our country in the context of involuntary emigration from war torn Greece in the 1950’s.

The methods used in this thesis were the secondary analyses and the field research (the questionnaire survey). The simple statistical methods were used to gain final result.

Key worlds: Greek minority, migration, identity, transnational, diaspora.
