

Abstract:

This work is focused on the issues dealing with the affectivity of offenders' specialised treatment during their stay in the specialised department for offenders with mental disorder and behaviour disorder during the execution of punishment of imprisonment in the prison with enhanced security. The history of specialised treatment with focus on offenders with mental disorder is generally described in the introduction. Furthermore, there is a specification of diagnostic criteria and aetiology of various types of mental disorders and there is also described the development of humanizing efforts within the Prison Guard of the Czech Republic in accordance with the legislative changes after the year 1989. Moreover, there is also outlined the way of treatment, therapeutic processes and methods which were applied within the specialised department. The aim of this research is to evaluate the effectiveness of applied therapeutic methods in the treatment community system. The results of the examined file are evaluated on the bases of results of psychological examination performed during the enrolment to the specialised department and psychological examination after the completing of the treatment program and subsequent ending of the stay in the specialised department. After statistical evaluation of the results a short passage with information about successful placing of part of the sample into the social life is introduced.
