

Abstract

This thesis deals with the right-wing extremism in Federal Republic of Germany, particularly in the Free State of Saxony. The opening part presents the history of the right-wing extremism in the territory of former German Democratic Republic. The following part summarizes briefly the development of right-wing extremism after the German unification. Main attention is focused on the current course of events. One part is devoted to the strongest and most successful extreme right-wing political party Nationaldemokratische Partei Deutschlands (NPD), especially to its election results. The thesis further monitors the development of the NPD's political strategy and the enforcing of this strategy into practice. A special attention is paid to the concept of National befreite Zone (nationally liberated zone). Next parts of the text describe the rapidly growing right-wing extremist subculture. The penetration of right-wing extremism into the areas of sport, music and fashion is proved on several concrete examples. There is a separate chapter devoted to the criminal activities committed by right-wing extremists. It also deals with the legislation which is aimed against the expressions of the right-wing extremism.
