

The present thesis focuses on current options of on-line study of Czech available to foreigners. The initial chapters are devoted to selected theoretical problems of teaching Czech as a foreign language and to a definition and description of e-learning. In these I concentrate mainly on teaching methods and their development, on Common European Framework of Reference for Languages, on basic language skills and the options of exercising them, on institutions supporting teaching Czech to foreigners, and on various forms of e-learning. In the practical section of the thesis I analyze available on-line materials on teaching Czech as a foreign language and propose a concept of an educational Internet server czech-online.cz.
