

Abstract

The thesis examines the discussion about American prison for suspected terrorists at Guantánamo Bay, Cuba. The author argues that the position taken by Bush Administration in its dealings with detainees in the early years was step by step denied by a series of the Supreme Court's rulings. Thus the Administration had to find partial resolutions and ways around that led to a demand to close Guantánamo prison. The author concludes that the main reason for Guantánamo prison to remain open was a question of unresolved future fate of detainees.
