

Abstract

This paper focuses on the Czech foreign policy in the relationship with the European integration between years 1992 and 1997. The Czech Republic shortly after its foundation has been going through the period of big changes and a formation of the constitutional use in the division of the competences in her foreign policy that led to the interference between the main actors about the interpretation of the assigned competences. In this paper are being researched and compared each concepts of European integration of the main participants of the Czech foreign policy and particular concepts of the main participants in the relationship to the European Union from year 1992 to 1997.

In the first chapter are analyzed the particular competences of the main participants in the Czech foreign policy and the theory policy arena, that is instrumental in clarifying the process of the creation of the Czech European political agenda. In the main chapter are examined views of the main actors in the Czech foreign policy on the process of the European integration and the role of the Czech Republic in it. Among the most important participants are chosen President Václav Havel, Prime Minister Václav Klaus and foreign minister Josef Zieleniec. In the last analytical part this paper reaches the conclusion that in the relationship to the European Union the Czech foreign policy was dominated by the division that was deepened by the opinion distinction between the main participants on the process of the European integration and the single form of the Czech transformation procedure.
