This work presents a question how blind people, to whom I belong, can constitute the world as visible even though unseen. Since it is clear that without others, sighted people visibility of the world would not exist, I concentrate first on the problem of intersubjectivity in relation to blindness, then on visibility as a notion and a process and last on possibilities to compensate gazing as directed seeing by means of other kinds of perception.