

This bachelor thesis focuses on the status and development of the Czechoslovak National Socialist Party at the time of the first Czechoslovak Republic in years 1918-1938 in the Turnov region. The thesis contains a short history of the party in the region between years 1897 and 1918. The author tried to describe the organizational structure of the National Socialist Party, its electoral success in municipal and parliamentary elections and their causes. The bachelor thesis also focused on the relationship between National Socialist and other political parties and their ability to cooperate in local political coalitions. Parts of the thesis are the history of party's youth organization and short biographies of important members of the party. The thesis is accompanied by election results in table form and historical photographs.